Late notice, but a webinar, perhaps of interest. Featuring a past NCRE Scholar, Dr. Kyle Hill!

Indigenous practices for physical and mental healthcare have always been used in their communities and there are now attempts to revive them and promote them in the mainstream. This UNPFII side-event panel will feature young indigenous mental health professionals who will discuss current utilization of traditional healing practices for mental health and research on effectiveness of indigenous treatment outcomes. It will foster dialogue between mainstream and traditional medicine practices, and their integration as the best way forward for mental health care services in general.

Join us on April 29, 12-2PM for an important discussion with our NGO Committee Members, Rick Chavolla (as the discussant) and Rashmi Jaipal (as the moderator), and our incredible panel of young mental health professionals, featuring:

- Stefanie Gillson, MD - Public Psychiatry Fellow at Yale School of Medicine and Institute Scholar at the Johns Hopkins Center for American Indian Health, of Dakota/Mdewakanton and Swedish origin
- Maria Crouch, MS, PhD(c) - Doctoral Candidate in Psychology at the University of Alaska and Pre-Doc Fellow at Yale School of Medicine, of Deg Hit'an, Coahuiltecan, and Scandinavian origin
- Kyle Hill, MPH, PhD - Psychologist and Assistant Scientist at the Johns Hopkins Center for American Indian Health (Great Lakes Hub) and Bloomberg School of Public Health, of Ojibwe, Dakota, and Lakota origin
- Ningsangrenla Longkumer, PhD - Assistant Professor (Psychology) and researcher at the North Eastern Christian University, Nagaland, India, of Naga origin.
